He has been accused of selling state secrets to the Russians

26. The novel is called the Railway Children and yet it begins with a negation of this fact:

To arouse the interest of children

27. Mother did not spend all her time in paying dull calls to dull ladies, and sitting dully at home waiting for dull ladies to pay calls to her.

Mother is an ideal woman who is so different from other women in this age

28. Does the writer support feminism in the novel?

Yes she does, in an indirect way

29. Mother was almost always there:

She spent most of her time with her kids

30. He knew what his kids needed so they considered him perfect

For the children, Father was just perfect :

31. There is a very close connection between the poem at the start and the course of the whole novel.

32. In the novel, there is a lot of repetition that is

Funny and important

33. Mother has brought up her children in a very decent way. She has given them the major values they live upon when they grow up alone without Father. Examples:

when Peter asks Ruth the servant about Father and later on he feels very sorry because kids are not supposed to do so. Also when he and Roberta quarrel in the absence of Mother. They soon realize that this is not nice and become friends again. They tell some family secrets to the station master. They steal coal from the station, and they apologize and understand that all this is wrong.

34. Peter says (a germ of endearment) in chapter one too in order to show up as the man of the house

37. The image of the dough is very interesting and significant. It shows how the writer is very realistic and specific at the same time. In an indirect way she has shown us how the children have grown oblivious of the absence of the Father, just like a dough that is growing will never be affected if you just insert your finger inside it

38. "Are you fonder of us than Granny was of you when you were little?" Phyllis asked

Then she was quiet again, and Bobbie kicked Phyllis hard under the table, because Bobbie understood a little bit the thoughts that were making Mother so quiet--the thoughts of the time when Mother was a little girl and was all the world to her mother. It seems so easy and natural to run to Mother when one is in trouble. Bobbie understood a little how people do not leave off running to their mothers when they are in trouble even when they are grown up, and she thought she knew a little what it must be to be sad, and have no mother to run to any more.

39. In the end of novel the narration's voice advises us reader to

He goes in and the door is shut. I think we will not open the door or follow him. I think that just now we are not wanted there. I think it will be best for us to go quickly and quietly away. At the end of the field, among the thin gold spikes of grass and the harebells and Gipsy roses and St. John's Wort, we may just take one last look, over our shoulders, at the white house where neither we nor anyone else is wanted now.
